

tightly in the arms of her mother, was drowned. Her daddy, Robert Clark, died, vainly trying to rescue them.

George Kvapvil and his wife Bella, who lived in the flat on the top floor, and Peter Hojek and his wife Rosie, who lived in the basement flat, also were on the boat and were drowned.

And so the three families that lived in the building are gone and the dog—they called him Teddy—is the only one left. For he sort of belonged to all three families.

Neighbors say he acts queerly now. He'll disappear for hours at a time, then come back on the run and scratch and whine at the closed door. They throw him scraps of meat but he won't eat.

He's growing thin and his coat is dirty and unkempt. They say he is grieving to death; that he misses the kind Bohemian woman who lived in the basement and fed him bits of meat, that he misses the kinly man who lived on the top floor and who stopped now and then to pet him.

But most of all they say he misses baby Eleanor—for she and her daddy and mamma and the others are gone and—

DEATH LIST GROWS IN ERIE FLOOD—19 BODIES FOUND

Erie, Pa., Aug. 4.—Nineteen bodies had been taken at 1 o'clock this afternoon from the tangled wreckage of the flood which swept through the streets of Erie last evening.

Coroner D. S. Hanley estimates now that from 30 to 50 lives were lost.

Each hour of the day from one to three corpses have been uncovered by the volunteer workers who are struggling in the midst of heaped up debris lining the course of Mill Creek through the center of the city.

Naval militia and life savers joined police and firemen today in the work of recovering bodies.

The flood was worst in Mill Creek valley. The stream runs through the center of the city. Four-Mile Creek also ran wild. At mouth of Four-Mile creek is a summer park of that name. All buildings there, theater, refreshment hall and several amusement places, were swept over high bluff into the lake. Company of vaudeville artists lost everything and narrowly escaped with their lives.

Communication with the surrounding country is cut off, but it is believed the loss is confined to city of Erie and vicinity.

On East 10th st., one and one-half blocks from State st., debris was piled twenty feet high today.

Twenty-five Lake Shore trains were stalled between Northeast Pennsylvania and Erie.

No gas or electricity available and newspapers were set with hand type. Loss will probably reach $3,000,000.
